In North and Thomas's view, the fundamental explanation of comparative growth is differences in institutions. What are institutions exactly? North (1990, p. 3) offers the following definition: "In- stitutions are the rules of the game in a society or, more formally, are the humanly devised constraints that shape human interaction".

An alternative characterisation of Roy's view of earnings as generated by occupational choice is that the earnings of workers are order statistics, which are used to describe the distribution of the n-th largest (e.g. the maximum or minimum) of a set of random variables. In this view, a worker considers the earnings available in different ...

This chapter shows how to develop an analysis of social interactions that builds the interdependencies that characterize complex systems into a framework consistent with individual decision making. They characterize both the theoretical implications of these interdependences and describe how to implement the model econometrically.
